GAO found that: (1) the Office of Personnel Management (OPM) and the agencies lacked time to prepare for implementing PMRS because Congress enacted PMRS approximately 1 month after it was to have become effective; (2) OPM often issued untimely, unclear, and inconsistent guidelines and regulations during the initial months after implementing PMRS; (3) three of the few agencies that provided personnel data provided their employees with general pay and merit increases and performance awards in accordance with PMRS; (4) one agency miscalculated the increases for many of its PMRS employees, which could result in erroneous merit increases in future years; (5) certain nonperformance-related factors that caused inequities under merit pay continued to exist in PMRS; and (6) award amounts varied considerably for employees with the same grades and performance ratings.
