Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from The Rush-Bagot Agreement When John Quincy Adams in November, 1815, on behalf of the Government at Washington, first approached Lord Castlereagh with a proposal for mutual disarmament on the Great Lakes, he was happy in his opportunity. The message, which, as the United States Minister in London, Adams had to deliver to the British Government, was drafted by James Monroe, then Secretary of State. The Great War which had devastated the world for more than twenty years was over, Waterloo had been fought and won, and Napoleon, not satisfied with Elba, had gone to St. Helena. The peoples of Europe were blindly feeling their way, and groping out towards some happier system, which would rid the world of war for ever. Already statesmen were building cloud-castles in the air, and dreaming of the reign of universal peace, entirely oblivious of the fact that, as Joseph de Maistre said, depuis le jour ou Cain tun Abel il y a toujours eu ca et la sur la surface du globe des mares dc sang, quo n ont pu dessecher, ni les vents avec leurs brulantes haleines, ni lc soleil avec tons ses feux. Visionary schemes were the subject of eager discussion, and found a ready welcome, and some of the best minds of Europe were being dazzled by the dream which afterwards took form as the Holy Alliance. - that strange system by which the banded kings were pledged to regard each other as brothers, and their peoples as their children, and to ensue the Gospel of Christ. That Alliance has been well described as a piece of sublime mysticism and nonsense. The Great Powers who were...
